Uriah Brandon grew up in Hickory, North Carolina and went on to attend North Carolina A&T State University where he majored in Journalism (with a Concentration in Electric Media) and minored in History. He also moonlighted at a local radio station in Greensboro, NC while struggling to make ends meet as a college student. In 2001, while attending A&T, he met director Dazzell Matthews and began making short films, commercials and music videos under their company named Visual Ink Productions.

By the summer of 2007, Uriah was laid off from his job as a car salesman. With literally a zero budget, he decided to call his good friend Dazzell Matthews and give a new meaning to the term “going for broke”. Bernie's McGuffin was the first independent movie project for Visual Ink Productions. The film entered several film festivals from Atlanta, GA to Seattle, WA and received favorable reviews from every level of the viewing public.

Later that year (2007), Uriah started working for a federal grant which facilitated a television/film production program for at-risk teenagers. During this time, he produced a news show, a soap opera and various charity related film projects. Since then Uriah has worked on several film projects, television projects, music videos and dozens of other creative arts projects from Los Angeles, CA to New York, NY.

Uriah Brandon is the writer, creator and executive producer of ub.newz (formerly UB News), Negus.News and Nigga.News. His up-and-coming News platform was created to be an avenue to express himself and provide awareness to his people. However, during the initial creation process he found a responsibility that ultimately lead him to a deeper purpose in educating his people about our collective lost history and the glory of our Creator.
